Director’s Notes

For the final production of this year’s season and for my directorial debut as a new musical theatre faculty member at UWSP, I think we’ve definitely created a show that will go out with a BANG!

The original film of The Producers in 1968 marked the directorial debut of Mel Brooks who won an Academy Award for his screenplay. This brilliant satirical dark comedy became a cult classic, thanks to the indelible leading performances of Zero Mostel as the down-on-his-luck slimy lothario Max Bialystock and an especially harried Gene Wilder as the preternaturally nervous accountant Leopold Bloom. Many will remember the tasteless genius of the major production number at the center of the film, “Springtime for Hitler,” which helped ensure The Producers’ lasting impact on American comic cinema.

In 2001, Mel Brooks returned to Broadway for the first time since writing the book for the failed musical All American almost forty years earlier. This time he took Broadway by storm. With his musical adaptation of The Producers, he expanded his original screenplay with co-writer Thomas Meehan and wrote his own music and lyrics to create a full score with sixteen new songs, inventively staged by director/choreographer Susan Stroman. The show won a record-breaking 12 Tony Awards and received numerous accolades for the pitch-perfect performances of Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick as Max and Leo. I was lucky enough to see the show on opening weekend on Broadway and I don’t think I’ve laughed harder in my life.

The musical version of The Producers is really a love letter to Old Broadway—set in 1959, the height of the Golden Age of Musical Theatre, the show feels in almost every way like a throwback to that era, but filtered through Brooks’ uniquely warped sense of humor.

What some might forget now is the shock value of a show that contains a musical number titled “Springtime for Hitler.” Brooks himself served in World War II, and as a comedian and writer firmly entrenched in the Borscht Belt Jewish comedy tradition, Hitler is in reality no laughing matter—there is real bite and social commentary underneath the joke.

Brooks said in an interview, “If you stand on a soapbox and trade rhetoric with a dictator you never win. But if you ridicule them, bring them down with laughter—they can’t win. You show how crazy they are.”

But at its core, the show is an improbable bromance, a sort of love story between two of the unlikeliest of partners who have been beaten down by the world but still dream of seeing their names up in lights—even if it takes the world’s craziest scheme to get there.

Bringing this piece to life with our students and faculty collaborators has been a real joy. Rather than trying to reconceptualize or reinvent the show for its own sake, I’ve worked with the ensemble to answer at every moment one simple guiding question: “What Would Mel Brooks Do?”, and I think the results that you see tonight will hopefully bring his strange but loving homage of Old Broadway to thrilling life.

As a musical, The Producers is a massive undertaking; it’s a “Really Big Shew!” as Ed Sullivan would say. It’s been incredibly inspiring to watch every person involved in the production give it their all in making the show happen. From set designer Greg Kaye’s gloriously old school-style wagon and drop scenery, to Sandy Childer’s glitzy and gritty collection of over 250 costumes, to Gary Olsen’s name-in-lights grand lighting design with over 1000 light bulbs, to music director Brad Vieth’s deliriously showbizzy music-making with our swinging pit orchestra and sensational singers, and choreographer Jeannie Hill’s homages to Busby Berkeley and Fred Astaire in her flashy dances. And last but certainly not least, the performances by our remarkable student cast who have taken on this old fashioned broad musical comedy and gaggle of crazy characters with professional acumen, humor, style, and heart.

Enjoy the show!

The satirical nature of The Producers is evident throughout - and the musical numbers offer opportunities to continue and amplify the spectacular and hilarious situations through dance. With a dedicated, willing cast and brilliant team of musical theatre pros the rehearsal process has been a delight. Imagine an assignment that requires an Astaire/Rogers mating dance that escalates into “Make’em Laugh”, a German fold dance trio with a pigeon twist, a lively romp for a chorus of vigorous old ladies and the creation of a fantasy tap sequence with accountants and sow girls drinking champagne in one show. Talk about variety! It is a daunting task to refresh a show after Susan Stroman has left her choreographic stamp, but we have had a blast in the rehearsal room creating the dances you’ll see tonight.

The Producers is a big finish to a big first year as faculty at UWSP for Alan, Sandy and myself! Scenically, The Producers is challenging in how specific and prescriptive some of its many scenic locations are, and then how theatrical and magical others need to be. I think you’ll find that our student assistance, designers, artists and technicians all rose to an immense challenge in mounting this production - and even manage to fit it all backstage! Enjoy!
